Narrative Description:¹

Executive Recruitment: Competitive Elections (8)

The head of the Federal Government, the Chancellor, is elected by the Bundestag, the first of two chambers of Parliament. The members of this body are chosen in direct, free, equal, and secret elections. As stipulated in the Constitution, they serve as representatives of the whole people and each is subject only to his own conscience. The electoral process is competitive and transparent and its outcomes are institutionally uncertain. In September 1998 elections, the incumbent Chancellor Kohl's party (Christian-Democratic Union or CDU) was defeated and lost the chief executive office to the Social Democratic Party (SPD) headed by Gerhard Schröder. In the most recent parliamentary elections (18 September 2005), a loose alliance between the Christian-Democratic Union (CDU) and the Christian Social Union (CSU) gained a slight edge in the number of Bundestag seats over that of the incumbent Social Democratic Party (226 to 222), however it failed to form a ruling coalition with the smaller parties. After intense negotiations, a "grand coalition" was formed that included the CDU, CSU, and SPD; CDU party leader Angela Merkel was then elected to be Germany's first female, federal chancellor on 22 November 2005.

Executive Constraints: Executive Parity or Subordination (7)

Germany's government system is defined as a parliamentary democracy. The executive (chancellor) is chosen by the accountability group (Federal Assembly) and is dependent on its continued support to remain in office. The Federal Assembly may dismiss the chancellor by electing a replacement in a majority vote. It may also request the chancellor's removal by the president. The chancellor, however, may introduce a motion of no confidence in the Federal Assembly. If the motion is not passed, the president may dissolve the body. The judiciary is independent, both constitutionally and in practice.

Political Participation: Institutionalized Open Electoral Competition (10)

The West German multiparty system was carried over to the expanded federation after the country's reunification in 1990. Many Eastern and Western parties have merged where they represent similar ideologies. Several extreme right-wing parties have been banned since 1993 due to growing violence against immigrants and other indications of a resurgence of neo-Nazism. The existing parties are durable and have inclusive agendas with mass-based national constituencies: conservatives (CSU), moderate conservatives (CDU), centrists supporting both social reform and free enterprise (FDP), moderate left (SPD), extreme left (The Left Party, successor to the East German Socialist Unity Party and PDS), and ecologists (Greens). No substantial groups and issues are excluded from the political process although the Turkish Muslim population, which constitutes 4% of the population, does confront economic and social discrimination. Human rights and civil liberties are institutionally respected, and the law provides effective means of dealing with cases of individual abuse.
